Good news story from Rome

There is an exhibition currently on display in Rome called FLOWERS: From the Renaissance to artificial intelligence, Courtyard covered in flower paintings.....

which proposes a path in which the inexhaustible evocative power of flowers emerges, capable of uniting art, science and technology in a universal story that spans the centuries: from the masterpieces of Jan Brueghel and Ai Weiwei to the most recent experiments of contemporary art with digital technologies.

The following photos may give you some idea of beauty and amazing creativity..... which we need in our world today.

An aspect of the technological part of the exhibition.

Living plants which attract insects, birds and other living beings.

Thousands of dried flowers tied together to form a corridor of flowers

This display of dried butterflies was one of many depicting different aspects of nature connected with flowers.
